HOW TO... CASS RIVER TRADER

CHOOSE A SIDE BY SIDE

When you're ready to buy an all-terrain vehicle that you, your spouse, your family or your friends can all enjoy, a side-by-side ATV might open up lots of opportunities for both fun and practical purposes.

ATVs have evolved, offering far more opportunity to be used by multiple people at the same time. The development of side-by-side utility task vehicles, or UTVs, allow for as many as six riders to join in the off-roading fun. And their popularity has skyrocketed.

Side-by-sides feature bucket or bench seating with enough room for up to six riders, and many come with 4WD or all-wheel drive capabilities.

Typically wider than most quads, a side-by-side can still be a blast to tear through tough terrain, with the added benefit of carrying a passenger right next to you to share in the fun. Many of them look almost like a tiny Jeep, with squared-off body panels and aggressive wheels pushed to the corners.

Side-by-side models are all built differently and handle differently from four-wheelers, though, so keep these factors in mind when shopping.

KNOW THE LAWS

Few vehicles blur the line between cars, motorcycles and ATVs like the newest side-by-sides. While they're designed primarily for off-road driving, every state sets their own rules for where you're allowed to ride them.

Some states treat side-by-sides like motorcycles, letting you legally drive them on public streets when you're in between trails. Some states require special aftermarket kits to make them street legal. And some other states say they're not allowed on public streets at all.

Before you buy, make sure you know the rules and regulations for wherever you'll be riding.

CHASSIS AND ENGINE

When comparing different side-by-side models, the chassis and engine can make a dramatic difference. It's the easiest way to tell how good a side-by-side feels when you drive it.

Engineering a tough, rugged

vehicle isn't easy, but the best models will be durable enough to take a beating for hours off the pavement without quitting or getting noticeably damaged. The metal the chassis is made from — whether it's heavy or lightweight, along with how it's built — can make all the difference when pushing a side-by-side's performance to the limit. Different suspension designs and ride heights also can help it perform better in certain situations, so pay closer attention to the mechanical and structural pieces of the vehicle than you do the styling.

Remember, pretty graphics can't get you out of the mud.

WHERE YOU RIDE

The type of riding you do can also inform your decision. If you want to use it like basic transport around a farm or ranch, almost like a rugged golf cart, look for cargo space, tie-downs and special features that can make it more useful.

If you do more extreme off-road driving, whether as a sport or just for pleasure, you'll want to find a side-by-side that's up to the challenge and engineered for high-speed off-roading.

ROLL CAGE

One advantage of side-by-sides is that they can potentially offer more protection from a dreaded rollover accident — one of the most dangerous risks of off-roading.

Many side-by-sides offer some kind of roll bar for protection, either built into the design or available as aftermarket equipment. If you're doing extreme off-road driving, it's especially important to understand the details of the roll bar and how well you can expect it to protect you in a rollover accident.

REPUTATION

Finally, the best side-by-side models come from companies with a long track record of making quality products. They'll have lots of happy customers.

While reviews of specific models are easy to find with a simple Google search, the most reliable information will come from people you know who already own the product.

If you've got friends who own a side-by-side, ask what they like and dislike about it. First-person experiences can help you decide.

When you find a side-by-side that meets your needs — including from both a manufacturer and retailer with a great reputation in the industry — there's just one thing left to do: have fun riding.
