HOW TO...

How to Choose a Physical Therapist

When you find yourself in pain or having difficulty moving, a physical therapist can be the person who helps you recover. Whether you have recently had surgery, been injured, are undergoing painful aging or are experiencing bone, joint or muscle deterioration from a sedentary lifestyle, your body may be suffering. If you're undergoing one or more of these life factors, your doctor may suggest you see a physical therapist to help you regain a healthy, mobile lifestyle. A good physical therapist will help you better understand your body and offer advice and guidance on routine exercises and lifestyle changes that could help relieve your pain. But because physical therapy is a combination of science, experience and art, it's important to choose the right physical therapist. While the majority have the proper training and offer good care, most specialize in specific injuries using a variety of healing techniques. People with back pain, for instance, can receive physical therapy to strengthen the core muscles in their back. Not only will they feel better, patients may also emerge from physical therapy with a restored, functional body. If you think you could benefit from physical therapy, first talk to your doctor.

Insurance companies often agree about these benefits. Most companies require patients to try physical therapy before turning to expensive surgery to fix the problem. In fact, physical therapy can negate the need for surgical treatment. After surgery, physical therapy might serve as part of the aftercare and recovery process. For example, when you have surgery to repair a rotator cuff, a therapist can play a huge part in a successful recovery. People with degenerative disc problems in their backs or neck will benefit from a physical therapy regimen. It can help ease pressure and pain. Normally, a problem like this requires surgery, but physical therapy can help patients regain a full range of motion. Physical therapists also provide the best remedy for other injuries. Someone with a reattached finger will need to practice with a physical therapist to regain feeling and movement. A person who has been incapacitated for an extended period may need physical therapy to regain their functionality. Insurance companies will likely have requirements. You may have to choose a therapy that is in-network, rather than out-of-network. Your insurance may also limit the number of visits they cover and require you to pay a co-pay or co-insurance. Once you have narrowed your search to a few potential candidates, inquire about the physical therapist's previous work history. Don't be afraid of asking directly about their success rates and potential problems. Also, contact your state board of physical therapy to see whether any complaints have been filed against the professional you are considering. The best physical therapists will provide emotional support as well. Treatment and recovery is very hard work, especially for patients in severe pain. When you feel exhausted, the physical therapist will provide motivation. A physical therapist will push you to your limits, which will aid in your full recovery. The therapist will inspire you to regain your full independence. This is especially important for elderly people who have problems getting around on their own. It is important that you feel comfortable with whichever physical therapist you choose. This professional may have to examine sensitive areas of your body to check for swelling or heat. They may also massage your muscles as part of therapy. You should feel at ease and safe during this process. The physical therapist will likely provide you with follow-through exercises at home. It is very important you act on these recommendations. It will help you recover faster. With the assistance of a good physical therapist and your own hard work, you can often recover fully and enjoy life again.

How to Choose an Auto Glass Repair Shop

Getting a crack in a windshield can be an unsettling experience, especially if it happens while you are driving. Aside from the momentary panic of having stray debris fly into your windshield, there is also a real concern about how much damage was caused and how much it will cost to fix or replace the windshield. Even small cracks and dings can be the harbinger of greater problems. They can expand and stretch across the entire windshield. Fortunately, glass filler in the hands of a professional technician can effectively stop a crack from expanding. But larger cracks often require replacing the windshield. Professional auto glass repair shops can help you fix your cracked windshield with ease and often for less than you might think — and many will come to your location. Whether you need a full windshield replacement or simply a little filler, and cracks are different. A full windshield replacement could easily cost a few hundred dollars — more if the windshield is custom or in an uncommon size. If you have a full-coverage insurance policy, there is a good chance your insurance company may cover the cost. Check with the policy about your deductible. It will help you decide whether it makes sense to repair rather than replace the glass. Of course, it is a simpler, easier process to repair a small chip or crack. It is typically an inexpensive procedure.

Workmanship

Every windshield repair company is different. When it comes to fixing cracks, they have their own proprietary methods. The talent of the technician will affect the final repair as the filler must be applied with special care and skill. Ask to see examples of a company's prior work. And remember that there are limitations to what a company can do. If a crack or chip selecting a skilled auto glass repair shop will help you get back on the road quickly. It will also keep you safe and prevent you from being given legal citations for an unsafe vehicle.

is too large in size, depth or diameter, most companies will recommend replacing the full windshield. The longevity of their repair is also a factor. The company's work must withstand time and use. The harshness of road conditions may cause the crack to reappear even after it has been repaired. Friends and family are a good resource when looking for a quality repair outfit. Ask who they use when they get windshield cracks. After all, almost everyone has dealt with a stone chip or crack at one time or another.

Don't leave it cracked. Many drivers try to live with a cracked windshield, ignoring the damage and hoping it won't get worse. That's a dangerous, expensive and potentially illegal mistake. A cracked windshield can distract you or obscure your vision and cause you to have an accident. Even a minor crack should be treated early to keep it from growing. The vibration of the car will cause cracks to lengthen and grow if they're not repaired. It can happen quickly or slowly. Hairline cracks are especially prone to splitting. When you repair cracks early, you prevent further damage and save money. The choice is clear as glass. Get your windshield fixed by a high-quality auto glass company. It is smart, affordable and safe.
